Distribution Game is a classical activity used in operations, supply chain management, and system dynamics education to demonstrate what is commonly called the “bullwhip effect,” that is, demand amplification in a supply chain (Sterman 1989, 1992). This phenomenon is not merely a classroom artifact. WebThis paper first describes a generic model of stock management and then adapts it to a well-known supply chain management game, the “beer distribution game.”. Subjects manage a simulated supply chain system that contains multiple actors, feedbacks, nonlinearities, and time delays. WebApproaches to illustrate the dynamic behaviour of supply chains are the well-known Beer Game and simulations. Even though the Beer Game allows students to see consequences of individual decisions for the entities of a linear supply chain, learning effects are limited because of the rather special setting. WebThe Beer Distribution Game, better known as the "Beer Game", is a group exercise developed in the early 1960s at MIT as part of Jay Forrester's research on industrial dynamics [Sterman 1989].
